Imagine a world without religion, where people act as God instructs instead of killing over differences in sacred scriptures. Would we be better as a species?

D.J. Parsons believes we might be—but only if control of human destiny can be wrested away from the men in power. In ...if they really loved us. Parsons delivers a searing indictment of men: the men who kill and then use religion as an excuse to blame women for the world's woes; the men who neglect and abuse their families; the men who victimize women and children with their twisted power plays.

If humankind is to survive, Parsons declares, the solution lies with women. Men have had their turn at governing the world—look how that turned out. Only by surrendering to women's instincts and rational thinking can we save what's left of the planet and ensure our own survival.

A passionate plea for female sanity in a world gone male mad, Parsons challenges women of all religions to think about God's words and intentions for the world in a new way, rallying women to pull humanity back from the brink of destruction.
